By Appointment.

A Prostrate Giant. The lumbering of the big trees of the Pacific coast is an altogether unique industry. Where the old-time lumberman in other localities depended upon conveying his logs by ice roads in winter, or floating them down streams at spring freshets, the Pacific coast lumberman has to get along without any such aid, for though the latitude in which the big trees are found is almost the same as that of Labrador, snow and ice are almost unknown.
